Student Activities

It has been sagely said that nine-tenths of a college education is acquired on the chapel steps. Perhaps to some this estimate is a bit too high; to others a direct slur at the effectivenes of the class-room; but such was not the genuine purport of the statement.

There is today a broader and fuller conception of education than existed a decade or two ago. There is an ever increasing demand for a well-rounded, harmonious development of a man's faculties. It goes without saying that the lectures, recitations, laboratory work, and practice in the field are the essentials of a perfect technical education. But how little would a man gain, how far short of the true magnitude of his own powers would he fall if he omit from his life association with his fellow-man!

So it is that student activities are the very life of the campus, the very heart of an education. At Georgia Tech they have always played an important role in the development of an undergraduate. To them belongs a major part of the credit for the school's success in moulding the characteristic distinctiveness of a Tech man.

Conceive if you can this institution of ours bare of all student life—its campus a drill field, its men a part of the great American army—and you will have a fair picture of what came to pass here in the fall of 1918. When Georgia Tech on October the first became a unit of the Student's Army Training Corps it sounded the death knell of its students' life; it transformed the South's greatest technical school into a veritable army post. All was made subsidiary to America's great drive for victory. Tech gave whole-heartedly, buoyantly, gladly, to the very limit of its resources; its men forgot their former pleasures and pastimes and entered into their new work with an indescribable zeal.

The New Year found Tech no longer a training camp but, instead, re-established as the magnificent college it had formerly been. Absent were the clubs, societies, teams, and publications that have contributed so materially in the making of Tech, but ever present was that inimitable Tech spirit, unconquered, unconquerable. Strengthened by the presence of scores of former students, many of whom had returned as commissioned officers, and by the absence of a multitude of men inferior to the Tech standard, a heroic attempt was made by the student body to renew the glories of the past.

To a marvelous extent they succeeded. From a campus bare of interest, from a school void of the lighter vein of life, in an unimaginably short time, rose the structure work of a greater spirit. The old was reconstructed and the new introduced with an admirable precision. But the summit of our success lies in the future. To this end our present activities are but a suggestion of the brilliant days that are to come!
