The reputation of Ga. Tech is based on the academic rigor and discipline that a student attains while at Tech.
To study or not to study is the question which hounds students throughout their stay at Tech.

If a student at Georgia Tech learns anything during his stay here, he learns two things: first, to graduate he has to study, and second, to stay sane long enough to graduate he has to find things to do besides study. Thus, for his four or more year stay at Tech, the student just strikes a balance between his academic pursuits and his extracurricular activities.

The necessity of study while at Tech is at the very least, a foregone conclusion. It is partially because of this that Tech enjoys an international reputation as one of the top technical educational institutions one may attend. Unfortunately, it is doubtful as to whether the students enjoy the school's reputation; it is very difficult to maintain a positive outlook after four straight days of studying with a grand total of twelve hours of sleep. Regardless of the fact that it might be 30 degrees outside or pouring rain, most of Tech's future engineers, architects, and managers usually feel that they are missing something when they are inside working on a project instead of outside doing . . . whatever.

It seems that "whatever" is the thing that eventually makes all the work get done. If one knows that as soon as that report is typed he can get out for a set of tennis or a bicycle ride, he is much more inclined to finish his work. The variety of distractions and attractions available is amazing, including sunbathing, Stone Mountain, all manner of sports, Six Flags, sleeping, shopping, girl-watching, boy-watching, drinking, and just plain being. To be or not to be is not the question; to survive four years and graduate is. Whether mouse, undergraduate or graduate, the student must combine his studies and other pursuits harmoniously if he is to succeed at Tech.
Most students manage to escape the demands of Ma Tech and enjoy themselves. The difficulty, however, lies in finding the time and not the form of recreation.
