Whole foods, whole people, whole planet. The Whole Foods Market has opened its sixth store in the Atlanta area with great success. Opening weekend was packed with a live band and numerous food vendors giving away their wares. Now, the entrance is surrounded with flowers and potted bonsai plants.

Produce range from mainstream apples and oranges to cipollini onions and clementines. With eleven different types of citrus fruit and over 100 different fruits and vegetables, everyone is sure to love experimenting. The strawberries are as large as small apples and quite appetizing. (There is a stand with free strawberries and blueberries!)

Behind the produce section is a glass-encased seafood counter, larger than the deli at either Publix or Kroger. It offers massamesalmon and halibut filets and the more exotic octopus and shark. The M Yale’d milk is cheaper than at other local grocery stores, though in other sectors their prices may seem a little higher. Their selection of frozen meats is about half a dollar per pound higher than most. This is mainly due to the strict standards required of their vendors— their meat and poultry is “raised humanly without the use of artificial growth hormones, antibiotics or animal by-products in their feed.”

The aisles are filled with seemingly normal grocery items, some prices high, some prices low, but everything is organic and nothing is genetically engineered. There is a large section devoted to sushi supplies, many aromatic bins of coffee beans, and almost as many international chocolate bars as there is world.

Cleaning products and all-natural pet supplies also make cameos. The cheese and wine selection is varied and broad, and the store’s deli is rivaled by no others. From berykai sushi warm salad to sushi, this massive deli is hit. All the wait here may cause some annoyance, but the food return makes a strong appeal for forgiveness.

A hot bar, salad bar, olive bar and brick oven lead to the cafe. The price per pound is very reasonable and the made-to-order pizza delicious.

Café

The ambiance was lively and the service energetic. A bulletin board with customer comments and their responses (much like Brittan) graces one wall, while historical pictures of Atlanta surround the antechamber to adequate, clean bathrooms.

Cuisine: American
Price: $5-$55
Rating: ★★★ 1/2 out of 5

One Midtown Kitchen is situated in a covert area in Midtown, within five miles of Tech, off More-land Ave. The building itself looks like a warehouse but has a very beautifully decorated interior. The ceiling lighting consists of what can be best described as thin tubes of glass. The restaurant is very dim, and can foster both an intimate and a more social atmosphere. Shortly after being seated, we were presented with two or three different types of bread and a hummus dip. The breads were hard, and of a cracker consistency. The breads looked a bit like a flower arrangement, as they were presented in something resembling a vase. I did not really enjoy the bread or the dip, but I am not a fan of hummus.

One of the most impressive elements of One Midtown Kitchen was the staff. The manager was very personable and welcoming, and our waitress was incredibly professional. The manager was very personable and welcoming, and our waitress was incredibly professional. The manager was very personable and welcoming, and our waitress was incredibly professional. The manager was very personable and welcoming, and our waitress was incredibly professional. The manager was very personable and welcoming, and our waitress was incredibly professional.

The atmosphere was very pleasant, the food was delicious, and the service was prompt and cordial. I would have to say that the atmosphere was very pleasant, the food was delicious, and the service was prompt and cordial.

I ordered Whole Red Snapper for my main course, and my friend ordered Steak with Frites. She thoroughly enjoyed the meal—that she ordered the steak medium, and found it to be very well cooked to her specifications.

Overall, I would have to say that One Midtown Kitchen provides enjoyable atmosphere.
