LESSONS from TEN CITIES

The primary ingredient of urban form is the subdivision of territory into public and private urban domains. Every project—urban design, building or landscape—in existing urban cores must understand the arrangement and dimension of lots, blocks and streets, and their relationships to pre-existing ecological conditions, prior human occupations, political imprints, cultural desires. It is these relationships that irrigate the basics of urban form with architecture and landscape design potentials.